"CBD is short for cannabidiol, an abundant chemical in the cannabis plant. Unlike its more famous cannabinoid cousin, THC (tetrahydrocannabinol), CBD does not make you stoned.

Which is not to say that you feel utterly normal when you take it. Users speak of a "body" high, as opposed to a mind-altering one.

The defining sociological condition today, especially among millennials, is arguably anxiety. It would be false to suggest CBD is nothing more than an obsession for bicoastal millennials. According to the AARP website, CBD has become a popular treatment for pain and arthritis among baby boomers.

Skeptics who assume CBD is just 21st-century snake oil, however, may be surprised to learn that the substance is being studied as a potential treatment for maladies as diverse as schizophrenia, insomnia and cancer.

The National Institutes of Health database lists about 150 of studies involving CBD as a treatment for conditions as varied as infantile spasms and Parkinson's disease. And the research has led to medical treatments. In June, the Food and Drug Administration approved a cannabidiol-based drug as a treatment for severe forms of epilepsy, representing the first government-sanctioned medical use for CBD.
